mal running of individual activities and businesses. In short, digitisation is doubtlessly establishing itself as the nerve of life in the contemporary world.

Equally important is the fact that it is only through digitisation that multi-faceted development can be sustained in conformity with international standards. And it is exactly this understanding of the formidable link between digitisation and sustainable development that confers special significance on the SDG Digital 2024 event the United Nations has organised as part of the 79th General Assembly session, mainly to show to the world 'the power of digital,' as so noted by Doreen Bogdan-Martin, Secretary-General of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) which collaborated with the UN Development Programme (UNDP) in launching the SDG Digital.

enter Lebanon and seize and occupy a buffer zone to prevent cross-border attacks and allow displaced residents of northern Israel to return to the homes they have been forced to evacuate.

However, this buffer zone would likely turn out to be a death zone for Israeli soldiers. They occupied such a buffer from 1985 until 2000 and ultimately were forced to withdraw unilaterally. Continual attacks by Hizbollah resulted in such high levels of casualties that the public outcry in Israel eventually forced them to withdraw.

In his speech, Nasrallah said that even if Israel had delivered a blow to his group, it

Get Down to Business

Sherif Attar

In a world of ever-changing ambiguity and uncertainty, executives have to face two challenges: excellent performance and people development. Where many managers think those endeavours are "competing", this author believes they are "completing".

GET DOWN TO BUSINESS argues.

Micro management is never a good idea. For micromanagers, here are the alternative activities:

- 1. Define expectations and goals
 One of the main reasons leaders micromanage is that they are not clear about what they want their team to achieve and how to do it. To avoid this, you need to define the expectations and goals for your team and communicate them clearly and regularly. Make sure your team understands the purpose, scope, and deliverables of each project, the roles and responsibilities of each team member, and the standards and criteria for success. You also need to align your team's goals with the organisation's vision and mission, and show them how their work contributes to the bigger picture.
- 2. Empower your team to make decisions
 Another reason why leaders micromanage is because they are afraid of losing control and making mistakes. To avoid this, you need to empower your team to make decisions and take ownership of their work. This means giving them the authority, resources, and support they need to solve problems, implement solutions, and innovate. You also
